If you do, you may be able to fix the problem by removing the contents of .A new scientific study confirms that scientists are more likely to give up their grant money when the amount they receive is capped than if it's unlimited. That means the price of freedom is higher for the scientists who are most willing to have the cap removed. I'm not saying I support the cap. No, cap, more like. I'm not saying that Canadians who can afford to donate to university research should be expected to make up for science cuts in poorer countries. But I am saying that, frankly, it's ridiculous when Canadian academics hold some of the same values that Canadian universities are supposed to hold — such as the belief that the burden for education should be shared, rather than simply borne by the wealthy. Given that unelected government bureaucrats have just voted to introduce a $33-billion-over-10-years price tag for the Canadian Pharmacare plan, with the first $2.5-billion part coming from the federal government, and the next $28-billion part coming from private health insurers, it might be worth rethinking the science cap. Could a greater commitment of private money make for a cleaner, greener world? Maybe it would. It's a gamble, though, that could cost Canadian researchers money. As a Nobel Prize winner with no intention of giving up his salary, I'll just say that if I'm voting, I'd say give the money back. Unless you're a senior, then I guess you're stuck with the pay cap. At one time, Canadian scientists' pay was in the middle of the pack among Canadian faculty, and was arguably quite competitive. There was no one at the time who questioned whether we had too many scientists, or the number of scientists we had, or how much we spent on them. But we need to re-evaluate the pay cap on research chairs, especially given that inflation-adjusted funding for scientific research has been essentially flat for 20 years, even as costs have climbed for 570a42141b
