The peak systolic (PS) and end systolic (ES) strains of the left ventricle were measured in healthy volunteers using two-dimensional strain imaging and compared with those obtained from a separate conventional method. The method of two-dimensional strain imaging was able to differentiate the different time-dependent strains of the left ventricle in each of the six segments, which was not possible with the conventional method. The peak systolic strain of the base (BSS), apex (BAS), and the mid-cavity (BCS), and the end systolic strain of the base (BSE), apex (BASE), and mid-cavity (BCE) were measured by both methods in the same patients. All the peak and end systolic strain of six segments on two-dimensional strain imaging were significantly greater than those of the conventional method (PConventional static random access memory (SRAM) is generally organized into a number of individual memory cells, each of which includes a single transistor and a single bit of data stored on a pair of complementary data nodes. SRAM memory cells have the advantage of high speed operation (SRAM is generally clocked at a high speed) and low power consumption (SRAM is generally powered at a low voltage).
