The present invention relates generally to optical communication systems and, more particularly, to optical switches. An optical switch is a device that can be used to redirect, in real time, an optical signal between any of a plurality of input optical waveguides and any of a plurality of output optical waveguides. These waveguides may be formed of fused-silica fibers and/or glass rods. An existing optical switch has a number of advantages over an electro-optic switch. For example, the light signal can be switched using non-destructive signal processing techniques and not by physically removing the optical waveguides and/or components. One existing optical switch design involves the use of a motor-driven rotary mirror to redirect an optical signal between the optical waveguides. In order to produce a large number of ports, the rotary mirror is typically placed within the beam path of the optical signal. The beam path may be defined by an optical coupler that splits the optical signal into a plurality of beam paths and directs the beam paths to the optical waveguides. In order to redirect a particular beam path, the rotary mirror must be positioned at a different alignment. A motor is provided to make this movement. A disadvantage of the existing design relates to the size and weight of the rotary mirror.

Although the inertia of the rotary mirror is relatively low, the moving mass of the rotary mirror can be significant and may limit the number of ports available. Further, the
