What's New Version 2.4.9: Addition of Italian language (10 more languages). Minor bug fixes. Customer reviews 9 Read all reviews 0 0 1 0 0 Customer review by 'virushunter'? Editor's note: There is no description for this review. AVERAGE 10 By jdk6411 I really like the utility but you cannot go back and edit the records after you have entered them. Also there is no clear way of importing and exporting the database. I will be giving this 5 stars because I have not been able to find anything for Macs so until then I am rating this only on it's functionality. I hope this helps someone else who is having the same problems. Good 5 By Sean_Stephenson I like the app Customer reviews 9 Read all reviews 0 0 1 0 0 By 'virushunter'? I couldn't understand what the essence is. I mean, if the above statement is true, then can we say that for any proposition SPS , the statement SPS is true for any number m and SPS is false for any number m is equivalent to saying SPS is false for n ? If so, what's the difference between the above statement and For any property SPS of a number n , if SPS is true for n , then SPS is false for any number m , and SPS is false for n . If so, what is the difference in the essence between the above statement and the negation of For any property SPS of a number n , if SPS is true for n , then SPS is false for any number m , and SPS is false for n . For any property SPS of a number n , if SPS is true for n , then SPS is false for any number m , and SPS is false for n . A: The principle of the excluded middle, as it is usually stated, is just that any statement is either true or false. Therefore, if you say "The sky is blue" (a statement, because the question of whether the sky is blue is a statement) and you also say "It is true that the sky is blue" (a statement because the question of whether it is true that the sky is blue is a statement), then you are implicitly asserting that the sky is neither blue nor not blue. This, by the way, is the usual interpretation of "The sky is neither blue nor not blue" (or "All bachelors are unmarried men") -- usually, it is meant to be equivalent to "There is at
