In 2013 a new governor took office in Illinois who was ready for a change. The previous governor who was re-elected had become entrenched and unresponsive to the needs of Illinois, his governorship was in trouble. Illinois was in crisis, as economic troubles intensified the state was teetering on the edge of bankruptcy. The last two state budgets had been unable to get passed and the highly anticipated budget stalemate that every state faces in the dead of winter brought politicians to the edge of their seats. The previous governor had cancelled a vote on a budget that took care of the state's obligations, an action that could have resulted in a state spending cut for 2013. With the budget stalemate not making progress one legislative group proposed an alternate budget that would allow the state to continue to operate. This alternate budget was sent back to the state senate to vote on so the governor could sign it. The state senate refused to accept the alternate budget. Soon a new alternative budget had to be worked out for the state to remain solvent. During this time, the governor was able to work out an alternate budget with the senate and the House. This alternate budget meant an end to the stalemate over the budget; there would now be a new budget. The new governor wanted to be a strong and decisive leader, a leader that would restore confidence in the state and get the state out of its mess. The new governor also wanted to be careful that he was not the fall guy, so he refused to sign the budget. The new governor sent the state senate and House back to negotiate, hoping to reach a compromise. Over the next few weeks they worked to draft a compromise. The two houses worked together to send a compromise that included issues that they both agreed on. The compromise bill was signed by the governor on Thursday, February 15. On Tuesday, February 20, 2013, the Illinois House and Senate went into executive session to pass the new budget. As a result of passing the new budget, the state stopped spending money and one more week of budget stalemate was avoided. This new budget included expanded gun safety laws, a ban on same-sex marriage and an increase in corporate taxes. Most of these changes were opposed by the previous governor and legislators, but due to a

Optical communications networks based on LightWave® optical networking technology are known. Such networks comprise optical line terminal (OLT) devices coupled with optical network units (ONU) or premises equipment units (ONU-P) that are each coupled to a plurality of media converter (MC) devices. Each MC device is coupled to a plurality of end users (e.g., homes, offices, schools, etc.) via a broadband network, such as the Internet. Various protocols may be used between the OLT and ONU, and between the ONU and the MC. For example, the Ethernet/DPath® (now Intersil EL1630™) protocol has been developed for bidirectional transmissions between the OLT and ONU using the DPath® channel optical links. Alternatively, the MLDS (Multi-Linked Device Services) protocol has been developed for transmitting from the OLT to the ONU with only the unidirectional link of a dual-channel optical fiber link between the OLT and the ONU. For example, DPath® channel optical links include each of an upstream transmitter optical sub-assembly (TX SOA) and a downstream receiver optical sub-assembly (RX SOA). The TX SOA includes a laser diode, a modulator, and a pair of collimating lenses, while the RX SOA includes a pair of receiving optics, a pair of receiving/detecting photodiodes, and a pair of focusing optics. The RX SOA is a reflection-based receiver, whereby light reflected from the ONU is received by the RX SOA. In DPath®, both upstream and downstream channel optical links share the same central wavelength of 1570 nm. A control signal is used to modulate a data signal between a “1” and a “0” and send to the upstream transmitter optics. Thus, in DPath®, a separate laser diode, modulator, and pair of lenses are provided for each downstream channel optical link. In order to detect the presence of an ONU, such as one in a two-fiber duplex link, optical energy can be transmitted from the downstream channel of the OLT to the ONU, and then the downstream laser light can be detected at the ONU. Since only a single end-user (e.g., a home or office) is transmitting to the OLT in each direction, ONU-P devices, such as ONU-P's or
