However, NSNumber automatically adds zeroes if the number of digits exceed three. However, I only use three decimal digits. How can I get rid of them? Example: NSNumber *i = [NSNumber numberWithInt:2.9]; i.stringValue // 2.90 A: My guess is that this is the result of the "excess digits" feature of NSNumber. As you mentioned, your problem occurs when you try to print four or more characters of "excess" (just another way of saying zeros). It does this by setting the first three characters to zero. One possible solution to your problem is to truncate the number before displaying it. In other words, do the following (in pseudo-code): decimal = 2.9; number = [NSNumber numberWithInt:decimal]; truncated = number.stringValue; This will result in a string value of "2.9" even when the original number contained 4 or more characters. Each thread runs at 3.2GHz clock speed, so the CPU runs at $3.2\text{GHz} * 16 = 52.16\text{GHz}$. If you use the latest version of the software, you can test
