Field of the Invention The present invention pertains to the field of flame propagation. More particularly, this invention pertains to applications of optical and acoustic technologies to suppress flame propagation. 2. Background Flame propagation (i.e., combustion) is of importance in a number of industrial and military applications. The ability to suppress propagation is useful in many applications, such as suppression of nuclear fission, for example, during storage and transport or emergency handling of nuclear waste. Suppression of flame propagation is further useful in industrial applications such as for the transport of flammable materials such as in surface transportation and underground mines. One method of suppressing combustion has been demonstrated using a technique known as the xe2x80x9csealant guidexe2x80x9d. This technique shows promise of suppressing flame propagation, but has the limitation that it only works for surface propagation. U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,833,680 and 5,041,313 describe this technique. The ability to suppress flame propagation for airborne (i.e., atmospheric) applications has been of much greater interest as the development of aircraft and reactor designs moves towards aircraft flight and deep underground facilities. Current methods for suppressing or extinguishing flames on the surface of a transport or storage vehicle such as an aircraft are limited to either compositionally inhibiting the propagation of flame on the surface or physically obstructing it by placing an additional protective material, such as under the pressure release or inflatable shield on a plane. If the aircraft is designed to go through significant vibration and fatigue and strength requirements are not met then the ability to suppress flame propagation in the aircraft is limited at best.
