An improved and specific voltammetric approach for determination of alkaline phosphatase (ALP) activity in biological samples is described. The enzymatic reaction is carried out by a fast and controlled dephosphorylation of phospho-enzyme derived from pyrophosphate and phosphorylated aspartate utilizing the two-electron transfer mechanism between the electrode and a gold electrode covered by a thin film of polythiophene. This method shows improved sensitivity and selectivity in comparison with standard electrochemical techniques based on a two-electron transfer mechanism. The enzymatic reaction is quantitatively followed by measuring a decrease in the anodic peak current of the film due to the reaction between pyrophosphate and the phospho-enzyme. The enzymatic reaction is sensitive to changes in the potential window, and the sensitivity is increased by placing the electrode in a solution of a buffer that is sufficiently far away from the electrode. This method can be applied to measure ALP activity in liver, kidney, and bone marrow of mice, rabbits, rats, and chickens and in blood plasma from cancer patients.Binaural summation in masking release. Two primary stimulus configurations were used to investigate changes in binaural masking release during a 50 dB increase in stimulus level. Either two narrowband stimuli at identical frequencies or a single narrowband stimulus at a nominal frequency plus a lateral excitation in frequency was presented to the right ear and the response in the left ear was compared with the response produced by the dichotic configuration in the far field. An overall increase in masking release was demonstrated, with monaural release decreasing as binaural release increased. These results are discussed in terms of mechanisms operating at the encoding site and at the thalamic level.

I have a hidden div on my page with the following code: `$('#menu').dblclick(function(){$(this).remove();});`
`$('#menu').show();` When the page first loads this line `$(this).remove();` will be executed and the div with id #menu is removed from the page. However, if I refresh the page this code has been executed already and a new doubleclick event is generated which is the reason why the div with id #menu is again removed from the page. I'm aware of the fact that people think that a doubleclick event should never be executed when the page has already been initialized. That's what I don't understand, because `$(this).remove();` is executed only once. I don't use some plugins so the autostart of a new doubleclick event isn't triggered by a plugin. So why is it that the event is re-generated every time the page is loaded? Thanks in advance for your help. A: You need to prevent the default behaviour of the doubleclick so it won't "trigger" the event again. You can do it by passing in an argument in the event. `var doubleclick = function(e) { e.preventDefault(); //.. etc };` Then you attach it to the element. `$('#menu').dblclick(doubleclick);` Also the removal needs to happen at the end, not in the middle. A:
