A California sheriff is warning that "widespread protests" are being planned by the "far left" in the days after President Trump's controversial travel ban is announced. According to the Bakersfield Californian, California law enforcement are preparing for "widespread protests" in the days leading up to the travel ban's announcement. "I think we'll have widespread protests in front of airports, in front of courthouses across the country," Kern County Sheriff Donny Youngblood said. "People are gonna get out and protest because the president is doing things that, to them, they don't agree with," the lawman added. "I just want to know who he is trying to keep out and how many people he is trying to keep out. I don't think we should give up our liberties for the sake of security." Youngblood said the law enforcement officers have already been "barraged" with calls from citizens concerned about the plan. "I've been getting calls from the National Guard unit, from our own personnel and from the police force and from every agency that I know, even from the Coast Guard," he continued. "There's a lot of concern in our law enforcement community. I'm concerned as well." Youngblood's comments come as the Washington Post cites Department of Homeland Security officials who say that the travel ban is not even optional and says that it targets countries with a "history of exporting terrorists." While Trump officials have stated that the ban will allow people to come to the U.S. if they have "clean" records, several legal challenges have found that language to be "overbroad," and the policy is likely to be overturned on account of that. Multiple lawsuits have also been filed because Trump's ban will apply to refugees as well. UPDATE: Shortly before midnight, the administration changed its ban to apply only to "foreign nationals" who do not have a "bona fide relationship" with someone in the U.S. but only to citizens of "countries of concern" and/or citizens of those countries with a "significant connection" to the U.S.Get breaking news alerts and special reports.
