I don't really understand what sort of stats are stored. The only thing I can think of is that it collects the number of likes/comments on the page. I think that if there is any way to read that information out of WordPress, it would be real easy. A: Okay, I just found the answer, and was hoping that somebody could confirm it or deny it (or provide a different explanation). Looking at the cached version of the pages, I noticed that the use of incognito mode was required to see the information. Once that was enabled, the data is visible. On the site map page, there was one sentence mentioning how incognito mode was necessary to see the stats. Incognito Mode. Incognito mode disables all caching to avoid affecting the stats and logs. I'm assuming that once that is enabled, the stats are cached, but I'm not entirely sure why that is the case. I'm not quite sure why this is the case, since there is no mention of caching in the documentation. I can only assume that it caches the pages if they are viewed in incognito mode. To me, it's nice to have the stats available for sharing. A: The data is stored in a table called wp_options. I could see that there was a column called option_name that had the name of the key, i.e.'site_stats'. The key was set to 'noindex' which disables searching and indexing the site. Thus the reason why the stats were not showing up. I did some testing, and what I discovered was that if you explicitly set the noindex value for the site_stats key, to a non-default value, i.e. 'yes', the site_stats key will show up on a search, and the value will show up in the database, 0cc13bf012
