If you see this list, it's because we're still waiting for response from you.Q: Relation between timestep and epsilon I'm going through the Ryzhkovo "Sensors" tutorial in pygame for 2.7, and I'm a bit confused about the association between the frame rate and the Epsilon in the comparison between the actual and simulated position vectors. Specifically, the author writes (in the video below around 6:40 if I'm not mistaken) that "the frame rate is the time interval between the position vectors between the simulated and the actual position of the ball." and he proceeds to say that due to the frame rate of 30 fps the order of magnitude of the epsilon "is 0.01" which I feel a bit odd, since I would have thought that an epsilon of 0.01 would be like 0.01 or 1 part in 10^5, which would require 0.5, 3, 0.125, 0.25, 0.5 which is far too many steps to average out to 0.01. Which one is correct, and which one is not? EDIT: Just looked at the earlier two lectures in the tutorial, and there seems to be some confusion. So the dot product is calculated as x' = x + dx y' = y + dy But there is then the following reasoning Simulate dx and dy and then compute the dot product of the
