“The premise of Anywhere is simple: the player is tasked with reliving a memory to save a friend. If a train runs over them, they’re finished. Otherwise they were alive then, and are alive now, save that one time. The goal is to make progress through a town in order to discover what happened in the train’s last stop. But the way you make progress is the equivalent of a Reverse Mine Field: you may be able to do one thing, but it may kill you.” - IndieGameLand “As much as a game like this one is a roguelike, it’s also an adventure game, it’s also an RPG and a stealth game. It’s a true mishmash of genres.” - Indie Game Magazine About FingerGuns: FingerGuns is a roguelike first-person adventure game in which you control a character trapped in a memory that’s haunted by an unseen enemy. FingerGuns features a tense and immersive narrative, in addition to a procedurally generated open world with no levels or enemy encounters. As you make progress through a town, its depth and story will unfold in real time, as you rewrite memories and uncover clues to your past and save your friend. The story follows Elizabeth, a forgetful musician and sometime heroin addict who can’t remember anything from her past. When a mysterious train knocks Elizabeth out, she finds herself trapped in a memory and is soon pursued by an unseen enemy. Her memories are being rewritten as she makes progress through a mysterious town, but for whom and what is she being erased? FingerGuns supports controller and keyboard/mouse, and if you play solo there’s also split-screen. You can also play any of those options in a 2-player co-op game that’s built on top of the main game’s core mechanics. The game was built with a lot of love for the unique genre it’s part of. In this game, you can control the way things happen. Instead of just jumping, you can run or press the right thumbstick to activate all sorts of weapon options. By pressing the right thumbstick up you can ride a motorcycle (for a stylish, fun effect), press down to open and

What's new:

It's been almost 6 months since my last post. A lot of things have changed since then and I'm not even comfortable to say exactly what they are. I'm not sure I could really even explain them in regular, sane terms and I'm not sure I want to know, even though I asked myself several times if I was brave enough to know the answer. I was an insomniac. I used to see the glowing points of stars each night. During the day, I'd rush to stand up before every yawn, to switch over to watch the movie channel and pretend that I was in that world, in that scenario. I never knew what was going to happen next. It was like a roller coaster; through the years, I'd done it myself plenty of times. Ride high, go down to the lowest point, ride again all the way up and then end up way up there, looking down at the world by looking down through my fingers at my feet. Except, for the time when I never made it back down, when you'd ride forever, you wouldn't know it because you'd never finish it. You'd go along winding up somewhere, but never return, never get back to the world. Adri has complained about this over many a night and shared with me her insomnia. I'm sure it'd be a story in itself too, if I were to tell it. Prior to all that, I was in a very, very happy place... It's harder to put into words than you might think, how much happier I was, than we're. Perhaps it's because I've read all the same books over and over, maybe I'm just as simple a person as the next one, but when I read the same books over and over, when I know ahead of time what's going to happen, I'm not so surprised. My world has been exploded into tiny little pieces before my eyes and all I needed was to see it happen again, to taste it for the first time. You can argue with me all the time and say that I'm not ready for it yet, but I understand that it has to happen sooner or later, that I won't be asleep forever. Why should I wait? I won't💎
