A tree is a living organism, just like a human being or any other organism that lives and grows. All living things have roots and trunks, branches, leaves and flowers, or any combination of these. The life of a tree is literally dependent on the water, nutrients, and sunlight it receives from the atmosphere. A tree grows when it receives and uses energy from the sun, and the tree uses that energy to grow. There are two things which help a tree to grow--phosphorous and Nitrogen. A tree can grow without phosphorous. It can grow with the slightest amount of phosphorous present in it, but it needs a lot of Nitrogen to grow in quantity. Differences in the proteome of lettuce (Lactuca sativa) subjected to different freezing regimes: FTIR analysis. Freezing leads to changes in the quality and nutritional value of foods. This study focuses on the proteome of lettuce, which is commonly frozen. The effects of controlled freezing on the protein fraction were investigated by Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) spectroscopy. Thirty-seven protein fractions were selected and each one was analyzed in three conditions: before freezing (BM), after thawing (AT) and after freezing and thawing (FT). Statistical analysis of the absorbance ratios between FT and BM and AT and BM samples in some of these protein fractions revealed significant differences between the treatments. Therefore, the condition in which the samples were stored, and the nature of the sample determine the differences in the FTIR spectra. Spectral features were found that may be related to the quality of the sample. In addition, cluster analysis and correspondence analysis were carried out to interpret the data obtained from the samples. The results of this study can improve the technological process of cryopreservation of lettuce and also provide information about the effects of freezing on the quality of lettuce.
