The FMR1 premutation is a common genetic cause of ovarian dysfunction. Premutation women tend to be homozygous for CGG sequences, which result in a disease when followed by normal length repeats (G-negative) and are considered benign. As an example, in women with the premutation the risk for ovarian dysfunction increases to 25-40% by age 40. FMR1 premutation carriers have an average life span of 47 years, however, the age for menopause in these women is advanced at 48.8 years of age and ovarian insufficiency symptoms may arise by age 50, when the optimal age for ovarian cortex biopsy is in the early fifties. The majority of premutation carriers are successfully treated with anti-estrogen therapies. However, many early transition to menopause women are unresponsive to anti-estrogen treatments. Preliminary studies have demonstrated that ovarian dysfunction in the FMR1 premutation is due to low or absent levels of the gene product FMRP. The subsequent failure of FMRP to translocate the paternally expressed gene Prader-Willi (PWPW) in about 15% of premutation carriers fuels the Prader-Willi-Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorder (PW/FSAD). Therefore, we hypothesize that development of the gene product FMRP in the egg, oocyte, or early developing embryo of premutation women is delayed or absent.
