I am trying to think of what could be a counter-example or something that might cause it not to converge, but I can't think of one. Any help is appreciated, thanks! A: This is to help you here in using induction on n to prove $$ \sum_{k=1}^n {2^k + k} \to +\infty $$ by induction. Here is the base case, which you know: $n=1$, we get ${2^1+1}=5$ which is indeed ≥10, the base case. Now, prove the induction step, with $n \to n+1$: $$ \begin{align} &\sum_{k=1}^{n+1} {2^k + k c9d1549cdd

CORPORATION The Tokoyo Corporation is a Japan-based multinational corporation and is the world's largest manufacturer of automated teller machines (ATMs). To date, ATMs have been the largest success story of the Japanese economy. Tokoyo was already one of the world's leading ATM companies when it expanded into automobile parts. Toyoda Miharu, the founder of the company, created Tokyogyo Company in 1921, a company which provided theaters, restaurants and telegraph services. In 1923, the Toyoda Manufacturing Co. manufactured the 19 horsepower Toyoda truck engine. Because of the low price, the Toyoda truck engine became popular. After 1945, the company was bankrupted when American jeeps were used in battles during the first Korean War. In 1963 the proceeds were auctioned by the Japanese National Bank. Thereafter, owning a company. the Toyoda family unsuccessfully auctioned twice, although company management, led by the elderly Toyoda Nobusako, successfully maintained ownership. Also, the company was expanded to providing alternative energy systems such as biogas CHP fuel system and daytimer system, printing system, refrigerent storing system, solar power generating system, heat storage system, and fire resistant system. In 1982, the Toyoda Corporation changed the company logo from 'Toyoda Manufacturing' (in Old English lettering) to 'Toyoda Advanced Technology' (in New English lettering), but the logo remained unchanged from then on. In 1992, Toyoda, America Inc. produced ATMs, with the 'a' in the name being an 'A' in the top right; the medium-sized version was the S-15 series (1995-1997). The larger size ATMs, the T-1 series, were the 999 series. In 1999, the company used the name Tokyogyo. In 1999, the company expanded into automobile parts and moved its headquarters and production facilities from Toyoda Machinery to Toyoda Chichibu. On September 10, 2004, Toyoda Machinery was merged into Tokyogyo. On July 1, 2007, Tokyogyo Inc. became the sole owner of Tokyogyo Corporation. On January 16, 2013, Tokyogyo adopted the shortened name TK. DISCUSSION Tokyo, Japan 1992–1999

My name is Christian And I'm the creator of 2D is a platformer game I like to make the games and share them with you I've recently seen a couple of screen casts about what is possible in 2D I thought the style was fun and fun to make so I wanted to try it myself and have fun I'm still learning, so please help me out Thanks for watching, Please subscribe to my channel The ability to quantify the 3-D position of a noncontacting object is an important part of many applications. The region of interest of a three dimensional (3-D) object is often very small, making it difficult to physically identify the location of the region of interest (ROI) accurately and reliably. One conventional approach to 3-D location measurement is to use an encoder to incrementally position an object in a controlled path. While this approach is effective, the encoder is often costly and complex. 3-D volumetric images are often used for medical applications. To acquire a 3-D volumetric image, a single set of 2-D projection images are captured over a range of angles. The 2-D projection images can be obtained by angularly scanning an object with a rotating 2-D plane. Different patterns of projections can be obtained by employing different patterns of rotation of the 2-D plane. The 3-D object is then reconstructed from the projection images. 3-D images are also used in many different types of 3-D modeling applications. Depth from Focus (DFF) and Depth from Defocus (DFD) have been used for locating the location of an ROI. Specifically, DFF and DFD require the use of at least one focus camera and at least one defocus camera. With respect to DFF, an array of cameras is used to focus on a 3-D object and to capture the corresponding projection images. An algorithm is used to calculate the distance of each projection image from the focus camera. An optical distance is then computed from the relative location of the closest projection image and the focus camera. The position of the closest projection image relative to the focus camera is an indication of the 3-D position of the ROI in the 3-D object. With respect to DFD, two arrays of cameras are used. An array of focus cameras captures focus projection images and an array of def
