She was nervous and ready to give her presentation on a math problem that worried her. Harris, a 30-year-old political newcomer, had recently come to Dixon and was one of eight county commissioner hopefuls vying for the seat of the first countywide elected official in a half-century. Harris' route to the stage was unconventional. She grew up in St. Louis but spent much of her early adulthood in Chicago, where she developed an interest in math. After graduating from the University of Illinois, Harris began working in math education. She taught calculus at a Chicago school before taking a post as math coach at Chicago State University. She was on the university's calculus team. "I was the best person on the team," said Harris, now teaching math at Aurora Public Schools in Illinois. "After my freshman year, I don't know how many of my teammates even knew I was taking it." By the time she was 30, however, Harris decided to return to St. Louis. She took jobs in the city government and at St. Louis University. She also began pursuing a master's degree in mathematics. Harris put her newfound expertise to work at the highest level of county government in 2004, when she was hired by the chief elected officials of St. Louis County, the five-member Board of Freeholders. While working for them, she took a job as the supervisor of the Office of Budget and Management. In 2007, she became the county
