Protection for Mac.Anxiety in the lower urinary tract: a urologic diagnostic and therapeutic problem.
Over the last 5 years, several papers dealing with anxiety as a urologic problem have appeared in the literature. These papers have dealt with a heterogeneous group of patients. Their results, however, strongly suggest that this problem is important and should be recognized. The papers have dealt with a wide variety of urologic and medical problems. They may be divided into two groups: (1) those dealing with pathologic anxiety as a mediating factor in diagnosis, and (2) those dealing with pathologic anxiety as a mediating factor in therapy. The first group of papers dealt with prostatectomy, transurethral resection of the prostate, resection of the bladder, transurethral needle ablation of the prostate, transurethral microwave thermotherapy of the prostate, and electrostimulation of the prostate as applications of hyperthermia. The second group of papers dealt with the use of desmopressin as an adjunctive therapy in patients with prostatectomy or transurethral resection of 6d1f23a050
