Such films are often provided with security or identification markings, and they are often required by law to be marked. Security labels can be placed, for example, on packages that are to be opened by merchants, wholesalers and distributors, such as in department stores and supermarkets. The labels are designed to be removed easily when the package is opened by the purchaser. This permits the purchaser to see whether the merchandise purchased is new or whether it is an unauthorized duplicate or imitation of new merchandise. While such security labels can be printed directly on the packages, the labels are sometimes laminated onto the packages first. This makes it easier to remove the labels, but it is also an added expense, since a separate web of labels must be printed. Security labels can also be made by coating a release liner with a layer of a pressure-sensitive adhesive, such as a heat-sealable polyethylene or polypropylene pressure-sensitive adhesive. The release liner is peeled from the backing upon peeling the adhesive from the backing, and the adhesive remains on the face of the label. During manufacture, the labels are frequently applied to packages in long strips. The faces of the labels are sequentially advanced, and the labels are conveyed past a calendar to keep them aligned. The labels are usually cut into individual labels on machines that incorporate a
