Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an apparatus for detecting a speech signal from an input audio signal and, more particularly, to a speech detecting method and apparatus which are capable of detecting a speech signal even when the input audio signal includes a background noise. 2. Description of the Related Art In recent years, progress has been made in speech recognition technology. The technology of speech recognition is generally classified into two groups: one group, typified by a Dragon Dictate system, is so designed that audio data representing a voice spoken by a user is accumulated in a memory device and recognition of a document then is performed by referring to the accumulated data; the other group is so designed that recognition of the voice is performed by analyzing the frequency and/or spectral power of the input audio signal. One of the problems with speech recognition is that a document must be inputted into a mainframe before recognition of the document is performed. Another problem is that the audio data representing the voice should be stored in a memory device for the purpose of speech recognition. One of the typical techniques for solving these problems is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,231,670. In the above patent, a waveform representing a waveform shape of a speech sound is obtained by extracting a predetermined parameter from a time series value of an input audio signal. The obtained waveform is compared with a stored waveform in advance. Thereby, determination is made as to whether the input audio signal represents a speech sound or not. In Japanese Patent Unexamined Publication No. 2-20945, there is disclosed a technique in which a speech signal is detected by using an adaptive threshold. More specifically, an audio signal subjected to filtering is divided into frames, each of which is defined as a block of sample data or a block of threshold value data. A candidate pulse is identified by referring to a waveform of the audio signal. A threshold level for the speech signal is determined by comparing the number of candidate
