A conductive adhesive is used for the purpose of preventing static electricity or making the surface of a substrate conductive for decoration, patterning, or the like, for example. Such a conductive adhesive mainly consists of conductive fillers and thermoplastic resin as binder. In the case of bonding a metal foil, for example, the conductive filler is usually in the form of particles or floccules of a metal having a silver to copper ratio of 2:1 or more. As a conductive filler in the form of floccules, for example, there can be mentioned a flocculated polystyrenesulfonate whose primary particles are flocculated. As a binder for the conductive filler, a resin composition of a styrene-methacrylic acid copolymer, a styrene-acrylate copolymer, a styrene-polybutadiene copolymer, or the like is preferably used from the standpoint of reduction in load due to handling or working upon bonding. The conductive adhesive, however, has the problems of low peel strength or adhesion and easy separation of the adhesive from the base. It has been strongly demanded to provide a conductive adhesive which is hardly affected by variations of environment such as temperature, humidity, or the like, has high peel strength and adhesion, and is not easy to separate. On the other hand, a conductive adhesive containing a flocculated conductive filler is generally used for bonding a metal or metal foil

The survey of 250 retailers found that 69.6 percent of respondents said their stores would be unwilling to allow a company to scan faces and use that data to make purchases. More than half (58.8 percent) of respondents said they wouldn't accept use of facial recognition technology to "reidentify" a lost or stolen smartphone by matching it to a photo of the rightful owner. While the use of facial recognition in retail settings is almost a done deal, particularly in China, retailers are largely on the fence about it in the U.S. "Retailers are the last people in the world to be in a position to regulate facial recognition technology, and we shouldn't have to wait for them to come out on the side of human rights," said Ida Kim, a senior staff attorney at the Electronic Frontier Foundation. "Instead, Congress should pass a federal law requiring the use of facial recognition technology to be subject to strong privacy protections."The Right Host For Your Event Start Planning!
