In the five years since the Pentagon's transformation was initiated, the U.S. armed forces have had only a minor impact on the globe, showing that even in the face of enormous resources and expense, large-scale change is impossible—or at least, it has been impossible to date. Getting the U.S. military to improve was always going to be difficult, as it is a collection of quasi-independent organizations and power centers, all with different agendas and some with a remarkably strong track record of resisting change. Making the war machine more relevant was never going to be easy, as the military's role is both substantive and symbolic. The Pentagon is not merely the greatest military force in the world, it is also the great symbol of America's global power, and that power is much diminished today than it was when the current political climate was first established. A significant problem has always been that the military is a very powerful institution, and the people who keep it intact are extremely well positioned to stay there. It has a capacity to undermine policy on key issues, since it can compensate for or overrule officials who don't share the same worldview; and it has a tendency to prevent the adoption of bad policies or the breaking down of existing assumptions, because it is aware of the negative consequences of change. On the other hand, if this powerful institution doesn't want to change, no one can do much about it. For the United States, this has been a hard dilemma to resolve. Every president since Harry Truman has made reform of the services a priority—to be sure, there was a lot more enthusiasm when the military was bigger, but the "reform" was always a modest reorientation of priorities and a reduction of staff to a sustainable level. The military has always resented such reforms, and obviously can't be completely done away with. But as one would expect, the degree to which reform happens is proportional to the ability of the military to influence the policies in Washington—or to influence congressional elections. The U.S. armed forces have little influence in the world today, as a result. Whether Obama's hundred-day plan will finally turn the Pentagon around remains to be seen. There is no question that the new administration wanted to change the Pentagon. c6a93da74d
